) I feel that there is something more to this, and would love to know what it is. A: This is probably related to the Open Document Format (ODF) standards. OpenDocument is a de facto standard ODF implementation. ODF 1.2 The ODF standard supports several document types, such as: Text documents, such as a letter, resume, novel, thesis, term paper, abstract, financial report, or business card. Text documents are not a standard document format. ODF 1.2 Advanced ODF 1.2 Advanced is the "advanced" version of ODF 1.2. The term "advanced" is not defined in any ODF standard. The term "advanced" could be just different than "normal" or "strict". The "strict" version is already supported by almost all ODF implementations. The ODF 1.2 standard doesn't mention any file formats, it just says that it can handle more file formats, some of them with various constraints. Other formats Spreadsheets. Presentation Documents. Graphical documents. All the above are not standard document formats. The file extension is.docx which is used for word documents. It is a Microsoft-specific extension. It really depends on what you are trying to do. This question: What is the extension of a DOCX format? From the above link, it looks like Office.Outlook and Office.Sharepoint use a different extension for a file that is a word document,.docx. However, I don't know if it's a standard file type for these or if they are just some of the applications that support this file type.
