Lipid A, the toxic moiety of lipopolysaccharides, is an essential component in Gram-negative bacterial cell walls. It is also present in lipoproteins that may be released from cells and, at higher concentrations, from death cells. The mechanism(s) by which lipid A exerts its biological effects is unknown. We have investigated the activation of MAPK in human monocytes and of JNK and p38 MAPK in murine macrophages, RAW 264.7, stimulated by lipid A. On these cells, lipid A was a potent activator of ERK 1/2 and JNK, but not p38 MAPK, and also of p38 and p44/42 ERK 1/2 in the human monocytes. Other lipid A derivatives had much lower effects than lipid A itself. This suggested the involvement of other lipoproteins, which are liberated from cells upon cell death. Indeed, lipid A-deficient Lipid A transfer protein (Lpt) mutants, which are much more abundant than lipid A-containing bacteria, were found to be much less active than wild-type Lpt (wt) bacteria. The Lpt mutants had a 10-fold reduced ability to activate ERK 1/2 and JNK, and 5-fold reduced ability to activate p38 and p44/42 ERK 1/2. Moreover, the major lipid of Lpt bacteria, galactosylated LPS, was much less active than wt LPS in stimulating ERK 1/2 and JNK, and in activating the
